Differences Between

Primary Elections and General Elections

First time voters and voters new to our state are often confused by what is expected of them at a Primary Election and what is expected of them at a General Election.

A Primary Election is a nominating election. Winning the party's nomination is the first step in the election process. It narrows the field in a political party to one individual for a specific office.

A General Election is the election in which all voters make the final choice from among the party nominees and the independent candidates for a specific office.

Not all elected offices are nominated by party

When a candidate is successful in a Primary Election, they advance to the General Election for their particular office. For example: in a Primary Election for the Office of US Senate, the Democrats run against Democrats and the Republicans run against Republicans. The successful Democratic nominee and the successful Republican nominee for US Senate would advance to the General Election to face each other and any independent candidates.

Individuals who are the top vote getter in the General Election are elected with the powers and responsibilities granted to their office by law.

The voter's declaration is recorded on a signed Application for Ballot. The ballot issued to the voter for the Primary Election will have only the names of candidates in the party that the voter has chosen.

When two Primary Elections are being conducted on the same date (for example, Presidential Preference and County Primary), the voter is prohibited from voting in different primary elections in the same election (one political party locally and the other political party nationally). Their ballot will be a straight Republican Ballot or it will be a straight Democratic Ballot.

VOTING AT A PRIMARY ELECTION

In Tennessee, citizens register to vote. No declaration of party affiliation is required at the time of registration. Tennessee does not register by party.

All legally registered voters in Tennessee are issued a "Voter Registration Card" by their county election office. No party affiliation appears on the voter's card.

When a voter appears to vote during any Primary Election, they must declare which party they are affiliated with, either Republican or Democratic.

Offices with a Mandatory Primary Election

President, Governor, U.S. Senate, U.S. Congress, State Senate and State Representative

What about County Offices & Primaries?

Each of your county's Political Parties has the right to call a County Primary Election for any or all of the County Offices and School Board elected in Tennessee. Local County Election Offices have no authority or right to call a county primary election for either party (nor do local county commissions).

City Offices are not elected by political party affiliation in the State of Tennessee (unless a city charter expressly permits a primary for a city office).
